Jane Fonda and Tom Hayden lost at the Supreme Court yesterday on their bid for access to a government agency's intelligence reports on their antiwar activities.

The actress and her husband argued that allowing the National Security Agency to decide what it wants to disclose gives it "a cloak of absolute secrecy" which could hide activities that should be known to the public — such as "defection of NSA personnel to a foreign enemy."

Although the agency acknowledged the two were mentioned in classified foreign intelligence reports, it said the files couldn't be released because they were classified top secret.
